could we do just that contracting portion? I think that would be valid to do for this section...or for this session, and then maybe to come back next year and really explore these other avenues. I would just throw that up. But there are so many things that come into this. We have a gambling bill that I think we'll take up in the next few days that will also be affected by this age of majority as we would move 19-year-olds into 18-year-old to be able to gamble. Do we want to do that? There are so many things that we talk about. As a parent, I can tell you--and particularly today's parents--where you have kids in high school that are 18, 19 years old before they graduate, and yet at 18 years old they become...they've reached the age of majority. And how do you as a parent then tell your own child, you know, particularly when they say, well, I'm an adult and I can make my own decisions, I can imagine parents working through that and struggling through that whole area. But all that aside, this is a very comprehensive area, when we start looking at the age of majority, when that happens. Age certainly doesn't correspond, many times, to maturity. We all know that. But when we take 18-year-olds and give them rights--which is fine, and this all started, initially, when we started drafting 18-year-olds into the service. But I can think of many other times where we ought to raise the age of majority to 21 or 25 years old, even like Senator Chambers mentioned. But most of the saving, most of the fiscal note in this bill concerns Health and Human Services. And I could think of probably nine bills that could have come before Health and Human Services to address the things that are now contained in this amendment. Certainly, if I can...I support Senator Erdman in his desire to do this. However, I wonder if at this point in time, if we should just look at the contracting portion of this bill. I don't know how many other areas are within this that we want to take up other issues. But the state wards, the foster care, all of these things that all come part of this. And yes, I certainly am for saving dollars if we can do that in these times. However, I do wonder if those dollars might be offset in cost as we move through this. But if Senator Erdman or Senator Brashear would...if we would just take the contracting portion and take a look at that,...
